Cleanliness and Enterprise

There is no good reason why every city should not pass most stringent ordinances to make the city not only cleanly and healthful, but also comely and beautiful. There is no good reason why a public feeling of pride and safety should not be engendered to a degree to stimulate the enforcement of such laws in every city. It would only manifest an earnest purpose to make the city attractive and pleasant. When such a public spirit prevails, everything progresses. Men are encouraged to build pretty dwellings and to improve all their property in harmony with the general interest. All feel sure that if they attempt to make valuable and beautiful improvements to the city, that their is no danger of their neighbor, who perhaps has not the artistic taste and wealth with which he has been favored, will be permited to destroy the value of his improvements by filth, hideousness and uncongenial surroundings. The ordinances of every city should protect the people not only with good clean streets and side walks and light, and pure water, but public prosperity demands also that they should protect every public spirited attempt of private citizens to beautify and improve their own property. At all events those who do not desire to build and paint and set out trees and improve their own premises, should be restrained by law from marring the beauty and desiroying the value of his more public spirited neighbors' property by the unsightly and filthy condition of his own premises. Every man's right in this country ends, where another man's commences.
