A man takes a ten cent cigar out of his mouth to get it in a proper shape to tell the editor to stop his paper because "he can't afford it," remarks a worthy exchange, the editor may say nothing, but he thinks a great deal. And when a man stops his paper because a two line local has offended his tender sensibilities and then worries his neighbor almost to death by borrowing his paper, the publisher may still say nothing, but he continues to think a great deal. And when a merchant don't advertise because he does not believe in advertising, and then uses almost the entire sidewalk in displaying his goods and brands them with all kinds of placards such as "Only $1; Very Cheap," the publisher may again say nothing, but my how he does think!
