Story of My Experience with Two Lovers.

BY ALEXANDRE DUMAS, JR.

LETTER NO. 3.-(Continued.)

There was a tinge of respect in that... Well, as soon as they were Why punish myself? Would my becoming Casimir's wife be a punishment? What juggling with words was this?

I must confess some men really do deserve credit. Look at this young man of thirty, a handsome, intelligent fellow...

In this making a confidant of my cousin I would have the satisfaction of seeing how he took it...

"It is fortunate," said he, "for you'd be bored to death if you didn't read many of these books."

"Under date of June 13 I found this: 'Cecile's mother received a letter from Madame de Marins...'"

"He has been very ill," I stammered. "That makes him more interesting..."

"He is not a thorough gentleman," I said. "Ob, yes; but there is no question of any man here."

"You are in error!" I said. "You did tell this falsehood; what impulse led me to utter it?"

"When I left my room the next morning, dear Blanche, I had made up my mind to one thing...

then in no uncertain light, but just as they are, completely different, but equally full of tenderness and sympathy...

LETTER NO. 3. BEACON TO ADRICNE. (Return mail.)

Since you love one as well as you do the other, toss up a copper! Marry the one chance selects for you. You will probably regret the other up to the morning of your marriage.

LETTER NO. 4. ADRICNE TO BEACON.

Now I know what I've always suspected, that you never loved M. de Gressan. I'm as sure of it now as if your heart were open before me...

LETTER NO. 5. BEACON TO ADRICNE.

Well, dear Blanche, it's all settled, and settled, I believe, by a gracious and all-wise Providence...

LETTER NO. 6. ADRICNE TO BEACON.

The day was chilly, and there was a fire burning on the hearth. Rene was standing leaning on the mantel when the servant handed him Casimir's letter...

"Rene!" I exclaimed, springing toward him. "You're ill. Let me call one of the servants to you..."

"Ob, yes; but there is no question of any man here!" I said. "You did tell this falsehood; what impulse led me to utter it?"

portance; we shall have him tomorrow. After dinner we all strolled out on the terrace, but after half an hour or so...

"Rene," I whispered, "Rene, you're in your regiment next week; we may never see each other again. Have you nothing to say to me?"

"My darling," she fairly gasped, "I have sent a messenger to M. de Villelong requesting him to discontinue his visits..."

"Discontinue his visits?" I exclaimed in mock surprise. "Yes, my child," she continued...

"A costly mistake." Queen Victoria is said to have a great fondness for pearls...

Some years ago her Majesty bought from a well-known London jeweler three very valuable pearls...

It is easy to get a medical opinion of any sort; but it is likely that doctors who assert that hydrophobia is an imaginary disorder...
