MISERABLE DEATH OF FOURTEEN LABORERS.

Tossed in an Air Shaft at Milwaukee's Crib, They Perish by Suffocation and Drowning—Tale of a Fearful Sight by the Single Survivor.

Enraged by Waves.

In the fearful gale which swept over Lake Michigan Wednesday night four teen men who were at work on the crib on the outer end of the intake tunnel at Milwaukee, 5,000 feet from the shore, met their death.

The dreadful storm raging throughout the night had lashed the lake into a seething mass of foam.

The progress of the Welcome was watched by thousands of people. When Capt. Peterson succeeded in reaching the crib he was met by a horrible sight.

Miller was safely brought ashore, and told a story of peril and suffering which has rarely been equaled on the lakes.

There out in the lake in the midst of the furious gale they listened to the storm outside and heard the waves beat against their refuge and literally beat their heads on it.

It was decided to leave. Only five succeeded in reaching the outside. The nine who remained on the crib were to get out to the water.
