Johnnie Got His Gun, an old tin can, in the suburbs of great cities, an industry has sprung up, having for its object the recovery of the solder used in making and sealing tin cans.

In consequence the formerly despised and useless tin can has acquired sufficient commercial value to rescue it from the black-loot dumping ground and garbage sewer.

Under the present system of street cleaning, New York City's refuse is loaded on scows from docks located at convenient intervals along the river front, and then taken to sea and dumped.

These docks have double decks, the upper projecting sufficiently to allow the contents of a cart to fall upon the middle of the scow, and be distributed by the trimmers who clean the vessel on an even-keel.

The trimmers also select everything of value with the greatest care, such as fat, bone, metal, paper stock, etc., being stored on the lower deck of the dock.

The space between the dock platform is often closed in with odds and ends, and the interior converted into a miserable habitation by the trimmers, men and women, who thus herd together, their supplies being drawn from the dump.

These dumping docks are the principal source of supply for the industry, and a wagon load of tin cans can be bought at such places for four or five dollars.

The furnace is an old soap boiler, into which sticks are thrown, the tin is then filled with cans, a quart of kerosene poured over them and ignited.

The heat developed by the oil is not great enough to attack the tin, but melts the solder, which flows to the bottom of the bowl. The solder recovered from a load of cans averages forty pounds.

After this process is completed the tin plate scrap is sold to make what is called "acid."

Into a large open vat containing waste acid, acid ferrous sulphate, sulphuric and other acids, the scrap is thrown and allowed to remain until the tin is stripped from the iron underneath.

Morose scrap and metallic iron is added until the solution is neutral. The tin thus dissolved is used as a basis for the preparation of stannates or other tin compounds, and by the iron plate is rolled into balls for melting, the ferrous sulphate purified and sold as commercial copperas, and the remaining acid used in repetition of the process.
