The Spectre of a Possible Coal Shortage It frequently looks in the windows of most steam mechanical plants. A railroad strike, a miner's strike, storms, floods, an embargo—any one of several things may make it a reality. If coal shipments are stopped the plant will be greatly hampered; perhaps it must shut down. Of course coal storage is possible—if you want to divert your capital to that purpose. The Danger is not present to plants that run on Electric Power from a Central Station The Central Station figures possible interruptions to its coal supplies as carefully as it does on coal itself. It keeps on hand always a mountain of coal. It organizes fuel resources in addition that no event short of general ruin can exhaust. You needn't think of fuel if you are connected with a Central Station. Another thing about the motor driven plant, connected with Central Station: It's ready for work in its full efficiency day or night. Just turn the switches and the motors respond THIS IS ONE OF THE FACTORS THAT STRENGTHENS ITS POSITION IN THE FIGHT FOR BUSINESS. Public Service Company of Northern Illinois
