The Biggest Thing About a Shop is the Most Intangible Thing

It's the organization, the sustained interest of the human units in their work—the morale. They all mean practically the same thing in effect. Mountains can be moved by a high morale. In a shop it insures a high grade product and commercial rivals take a large sized contract when they attack good goods. If a man is a messenger of the Gods he doesn't need any advice. But for the ordinary manufacturer casting about for ways and means to infuse into the man element in his manufacturing equipment the spirit of his own ambition there is strong suggestion in

Electric Power

It gives the craftsman a tool to work with whose characteristics are instant and unerring obedience, high power and in a good deal of work that it has to do an intelligence that is uncanny. No workman can operate an electric motor without improving.

Electric power doesn't require the field of a big plant to exhibit its efficiency, economy and all round superiority. It shows up just as well in a little shop.
