

Our fair but long silent friend GERTRUDE, has again honored us with a very beautifully worded article on the glories of departing Autumn. We would very much like to hear from Miss Gertrude periodically. her articles thus far proving very acceptable from their purity and worth.

AUTUMN.

How often are we reminded that all things earthly are rapidly passing away. And at no season of the year more so than in the Autumn. That most melancholy of all seasons—when vegetation has culminated in the golden yellow of ripeness, rewarding the husbandman for his labors with loaded garners from the matured fruits of mother earth.

On the other hand the season affords matter for reflection to the thoughtful student, and admiration to the lover of nature and natures works. What is more beautiful than the rising and setting of an Indian summer sun, as it lends its mild and gently toned rays to reflect the grandeur of departing summer—tempting our presumptuous art to imitate and transfer to canvas the beautiful and soul inspiring picture of retiring nature, dressed in all its prismatic hues, and scorning, as it sinks to its home in the western horizon, our feeble vanity and imperfect copy?

To the student and God-reflecting, Autumn leaves a more noble and lasting impression, it seems to remind him that all things have a limit and decay and rottenness are to be the end of all things earthly. That he too, perhaps in the autumn of his years, may soon pass away like the enchanting scene before him, and that perhaps even now, the chilling hand of death is upon him, and angels are in readiness to guide his immortal soul to the realms of the never dying.
